9. MANDATORY DATA COLLECTION

Australian schools are required by the government to collect details from parents about family background. The information will be used to help identify factors which influence how well children perform at school.

Many schools have already asked parents similar questions at enrolment, but as part of a coordinated nationwide approach each school – no matter whether it is an independent, government or Catholic school will send parents the same set of questions.

Supporting Australia's national goals for schooling Parent responses to these questions will be linked to student results in national student testing for literacy and numeracy in Years 3, 5, 7 and 9 and the sample groups of students from Years 6 and 10 assessed every three years in science, information and communication technology, and civics and citizenship education.

The results of these assessments are reported annually in the National Report on Schooling in Australia published by the Ministerial Council on Education, Employment, Training and Youth Affairs (for more information: www.mceetya.edu.au/).

The new linked information gathering follows an agreement between all Ministers of Education in Australia – including federal and state/territory Ministers – known as the National Goals for Schooling in the Twenty-First Century (for more information: www.mceetya.edu.au/).

The National Goals aim to ensure that all young people achieve a high standard of education at school. Ministers have also undertaken to better inform parents and the Australian public on progress towards this end. Their vision is that student achievement should not depend on factors such as gender, the language spoken at home, ethnicity, religion or disability. A student's socioeconomic background or geographic location should also not be a factor.

Better information gathering

Because family background information will be collected in a consistent way, it will be possible in future to report results for these different categories of students - male/female students, Indigenous students, students whose parents speak a language other than English at home etc. (Currently, the reporting covers overall results in each state and territory for each school year group being assessed.)

Information about individual student results and backgrounds will be processed in a way that protects the privacy of each student, but will help the Australian community – including governments, education authorities, schools and parents – to take more informed action to improve student success.

Are schools required to ask these questions?

Yes. Schools receive government funding for each student's education and are required to ask these questions as part of their conditions of funding. Schools should encourage parents to answer the questions and should explain that their participation will help support the improvement of schooling for all Australian children.

Protection of your family's privacy

All schools have comprehensive confidentiality and security policies and procedures for the collection and handling of personal information. Schools are required to have such policies to comply with privacy laws throughout Australia.

No information that would reasonably identify an individual student will be reported publicly. The only information published will be state and territory summaries. If you have any specific concerns about privacy you should talk to your school.
